The confusion inside the walls beggars description and we may reckon ourselves fortunate indeed that escaped without injury on that terrible day. The following morning the Governor-General issued a proclamation forbidding the people to leave, and assuring them that ample provision was made for their safety in all contingencies. which announcement had the effect of allaying the popular panie to a great extent.

Monkdon's walls are very high and of very considerable strength. There is an inner, or it may be called a citadel wall, built of brick and enclosing the city proper, which covers about one square li of ground, and contains all the yamens and official buildings, the larger temples and shops and the residences of the wealthier classes of the inhabitants. The outer wall is built of mud, but it is very strong, thick, and well constructed. It measures about eight miles in circumference, and between it and the inner wall lie the poorer quarters of the city. exercise grounds for the troops, and patches of fields for the cultivation of vegetables, There is no Treasure in Moukden, contrary

ANXIETY IN HIGH STATIONS.

An official holding an acting appointment in one of the larger vamens, told me test telegrams were being received daily from Tientsin and eking arging the local authorities to be most careful in guarding the lives of foreigners and Christian converts. The reference to native converts is most nousual; in fact it is the first time I have known them to be included in such an order, and the circumstance. I think, goes to prove that the Government is most anxious to propitiate the Powers. I have nothing but hearty admiration for the courage and devotion of our country, living far from the main roads, and entirely isolated from all sive those to whom they came to preach. THE PROGRESS OF THE WAR. About the war itself you probably know a other part of China perhaps; and besides, it is such a long time since I left Monkden that I cannot say what is going on now in Manchuria. After taking Chin-lien-chang the belief was that the Japanese would march north-west lowards Moukden; so General Sung, the Commander of the district, went like a good soldier to take possession of the principal pass. Finding, however, that the Japanese did not intend to march in force by that route, he executed a retrograde movement; and, according to the statements of those whom I sent to the spot to make enquiries, he apparently came up with the rear guard of the Japanese army, which was marching southward, and engaged it, but with what result, I am not in a position to say. Because the Japanese did not march on Monkden straight from Chin lionchang, the Chinese came to the conclusion that the invading army had been defeated but I do not think there is much ground for the surmise. General Sung left one of This lieutenants Mn. a soldier who is said never to have suffered defeat, to guard the "Touching the Heavens," pass, and it may be that a small body of Japanese troops were driven back by this doughty soldier. But it cannot be that anv considerable engagement has taken place Chiu-lieu-chêug has not been retaken by the Ohinese, as has been reported: but on the other hand, it was, when I left, not true that the Japanese have entered Fong-hwang-shoug. General Sung, when he occupied the place, burned all the grain that was stored there so that it might not fall into the hands of the Japanese, who were then expected to attack the position. But the only Japanese who appeared there were a few scouls thrown out to full the
